...TEXT: demand for shipping the commodity.(1) I show that the tests used to demonstrate that shipping conferences practice price discrimination are in error.

In section II, the theoretical issues involved in detecting price discrimination...

...the literature on price discrimination, showing why it does not address the question of whether shipping conferences practice price discrimination. In section IV, I discuss some alternative tests. Section V offers some possible directions...

...peak-load pricing. Peak-load pricing schemes are efficient, and they produce discriminatory prices.

If shipping conferences practice price discrimination, it may be for either of these two reasons. Both explanations assert that the...

...of more than just differences in marginal cost. In short, before we can analyze why shipping conferences practice price discrimination, we must first know whether they in fact do so. It is the central...

...established by any of the authors who have addressed this issue.

The question of whether shipping conferences practice price discrimination has attracted the attention of policy makers several times. In the 1960s, the Joint...

...result of monopoly created by Federal Maritime Commission regulation (pp. 42-43).

The claim that shipping conferences practice price discrimination has been subjected to substantial empirical testing. A number of studies have attempted to measure whether and to what extent shipping conferences price discriminate. Usually they conclude that price discrimination is practiced. I claim, however, that the studies...

...may exist. I will show that the tests that have been used to determine whether shipping conferences price discriminate do not distinguish between price discrimination and cost-based price differences. Moreover, many of...shipping services is simply the elasticity of demand for the product being shipped times the share of the shipping cost in the total cost of the good. Zero elasticity of substitution between liner shipping...discrimination is based on the commodity shipped rather than on the shipper as such, a shipper cannot evade price discrimination by sending his goods through another shipper. The only way a shipper can evade price discrimination is by disguising his shipment as a lower rated commodity. Before containerization, a conference...

...be identified. One approach may be to attempt to estimate multiproduct cost functions directly, in order to measure the marginal cost of shipping different goods, and then compare them to observed...a final report in 1966.
